Consultation re Proposed Changes to Permitted Development Rights

The Government has launched a consultation regarding its proposal to extend permitted development rights to homeowners and businesses.

The Government is proposing action in five areas:

1. Increasing the size limits for the depth of single-storey domestic extensions from 4m to 8m (for detached houses) and from 3m to 6m (for all other houses), in non-protected areas, for a period of three years. No changes are proposed for extensions of more than one storey.
2. Increasing the size limits for extensions to shop and professional/financial services establishments to 100m², and allowing the building of these extensions up to the boundary of the property (except where the boundary is with a residential property), in non-protected areas, for a period of three years.
3. Increasing the size limits for extensions to offices to 100m², in non-protected areas, for a period of three years.
4. Increasing the size limits for new industrial buildings within the curtilage of existing industrial premises to 200m², in non-protected areas, for a period of three years.

5. Removing some prior approval requirements for the installation of broadband infrastructure for a period of five years.

In addition the Government wish to explore whether there is scope to use permitted development to make it easier to carry out garage conversions.

Other changes to permitted development are also being taken forward separately: making it easier for commercial properties to be converted to residential use; and encouraging the reuse of existing buildings through making changes of use easier. These changes have been subject to consultation already, so are not included in this consultation.

This consultation ends on 24 December 2012. To respond to the consultation by e-mail to:
