Still no Night Flight Ban

Residents expressed disappointment that the Government has still not committed itself to a night flight ban in its consultation on a new night flight regime at Heathrow, Stansted and Gatwick, released earlier today. However, they have welcomed the fact that the Government is prepared to look at measures that could mitigate the noise. These include increasing the angle of descent on approach; guaranteed respite periods; changing the existing scheduling or operating bans which affect the noisiest aircraft types.

This consultation is the first part of a two-stage consultation process into replacing the current night flight regime at the UK 's three designated airports that runs out in October 2014. The first stage closes on 22nd April. The second part will contain more detailed proposals.

John Stewart, Chair of HACAN, which represents residents under the Heathrow flight paths, said: "We are very clear that we want a ban on night flights before 6 o'clock and a progressive reduction between 6am and 7am. Many people under the Heathrow flight paths don't need an alarm clock; the first plane wakes them at 4.30 am."

Stewart added: "However, we do welcome the fact that the Government is prepared to look at noise mitigation measures such as steeper approaches and guaranteed respite periods."

Currently there are 16 flights permitted at Heathrow between 11.30pm and 6am and around 60 between 6am and 7am. Link to the consultation:

"A little bit of excitement to break the monotony, I had a tap on the window this afternoon from some idiot who could not work out how to open my porch door & who said that his firm had done some work next door on the roof and needed to check it now that it was raining. He asked for my phone number so that his boss could contact me and explain the situation, this was fairly /...

quickly followed by a caller who repeated the story and tried to elaborate until I asked him the name of the people next door when his phone suddenly developed a fault in that he could no longer hear me, so I put the phone down and waited till he rang again, with the same outcome except that this time I was very rude and told him to `p*** off` when he still could not tell me the name and put the phone down. This appears to have done the trick, there have been no more calls. I thought you might like to know of the skulduggery some people get up to”
